The Abenaki filmmaker interviews Indigenous women across the country who seek to put an end to the cycle of violence, from community advocates to sex workers, survivors of domestic abuse, politicians and victim's loved ones. Their testimonies reveal the different forms that violence against Indigenous women can take, and how the epidemic's roots lie in Canada's legacy of colonialism and racism. Quiet Killing is a story of violence, resilience and institutional neglect that carries a vital message about Indigenous women's right to safety and justice.
